MORECAMBE BAY WALK

Once again, the Sentinel is pleased to give notice of the annual sponsored walk across Morecambe Bay organised by Shipley Support Group for Manorlands, the Sue Ryder hospice at Oxenhope. This year's eight mile walk with Queen's Guide Cedric Robinson MBE is due to take place on Sunday, May 17th, leaving Arnside at 11am. To take part, it will be necessary to obtain an entry form and number from Peter Chamberlain:

Whatever the weather may be like outside, when Phil Kelsall, resident organist at the Tower Ballroom, Blackpool, comes up through the floor of Victoria Hall, with the full force of the recently installed Wurlitzer Theatre Pipe Organ at his fingertips there is bound to be a distinct flavour of the seaside in the air.

Thus will begin an evening of Ballroom Dancing on Saturday, March 21st. Doors open at 7.30pm, so "Polish up those dancing shoes and come along," says Peter Rushton of the Cinema Organ Society.

Easter weekend will see the start of the inaugural concert season, with a Gala Opening Concert on April 11th featuring Nigel Ogden and Simon Gledhill and including Piano and Wurlitzer duets. Monthly Sunday concerts begin on 12th.

THE CASE OF THE LOOKALIKE CHURCH

IS THIS OUR TOWER?

Roger Clarke reports

on Saint Mary's in Banbury

which, on first sight, bears an uncanny resemblance to the building which is now Saltaire United Reformed Church. On the right, Tim Smith of renowned local architects Rance Booth and Smith gives his considered opinion. Photograph kindly supplied by Chris Sharp.

Sir Titus Salt's church, designed by Lockwood and Mawson, is often described as an "iconic" building and until now was regarded, by local folk at least, as unique. However, new questions have inadvertently been raised by a recent piece of research:

Former Shipley College lecturer Jane Hedworth wanted information about the architecture of Saltaire for her website (angloitalia.com) and asked me for help. This contact, via the College, led to further investigations, and by chance Jane found an image of St Mary's Church, Banbury, which at first glance could easily be mistaken for the Saltaire version.

Fortunately for us, Jane has been very generous and shared her discovery.

St Mary's pre-dates the Saltaire Church by many years. There was a medieval building on the site, but the present building is Georgian and was consecrated in 1797. Part of this building and the old tower collapsed in 1790, and were not replaced and rebuilt until the present tower was completed in 1822. Were Lockwood and Mawson, architects of the Saltaire church, aware of the Banbury Church before designing their own? Or are there links between Sir Titus and Banbury? Research so far reveals no obvious links. Significantly, St Mary's was an Anglican church until relatively recently when it became United Reformed. However, neither congregation was aware of the similarity of the architecture in the two buildings.

Dave Shaw and Hattie Townsend have both taken the trouble to call at Banbury, and both comment on the large size of the church tower, with its extra tier of building which they describe as "impressive". The church has a particular claim to historical fame because Jonathan Swift is said to have taken the name Gulliver from tombstones in the churchyard. The Banbury Church was designed by Samuel Pepys Cockerill, great, great nephew of the famous diarist, and he is thought to have modelled it on St Stephen's Church, Walbrook, which was designed by Sir Christopher Wren. At one time Clerk of Works at the Tower of London, Cockerill was then, together with John Nash of Brighton Pavillion fame, apprenticed to Sir Robert Taylor in the East India Company and made a number of visits to India. His designs, such as that for St Anne's Church in Soho, often feature ornate towers, perhaps reflecting the architect's background.

Jane's discovery has opened up a puzzle about Saltaire which future research may build upon – and perhaps, one day, solve!

An Architect's Eye View

It is certainly possible that Lockwood and Mawson did visit Banbury Church or at least see some drawings of it. It is the portico downwards where the closest similarities lie, with the portico door and the six Corinthian columns being very similar. There are major differences however. Banbury appears to have no imposing flight of steps to the entrance, and the tower and lower roof are completely different. At Saltaire Church the base of the tower above is wider than the portico base and this has caused some structural problems. This does not appear to be the case at Banbury. The plans and forms of the buildings appear to be very different, and it is only the façade where the similarities are. Bearing in mind that Lockwood and Mawson had no Schools of Architecture at that time, they would have learnt their trade in an office and by studying the numerous books of classical styles, or by visits. A classical revival church would be likely to have a classical portico in Corinthian columns. Lockwood went to London reviewing buildings and styles and it is certainly possible that he visited Banbury on such a visit. He would be picking up ideas from all quarters for the church at Saltaire.

Despite some similarities with Banbury, overall Saltaire United Reformed Church is unique.

Correspondence

As occasional visitors to Saltaire from south West Yorkshire, my family were shocked to see the destruction to the river bank trees on Sunday morning. The decimation is saddening in these days when we thought mature trees were appreciated and protected. Do you know why they were cut down? Those near the weir seemed not to have been chopped by an expert. It was ironic to read of your fight to reprieve four trees elsewhere in Saltaire.

FERNIEHURST DELL PLANS

The first meeting of the newly formed Ferniehurst Dell Improvement Partnership took place on the first of last month. Improvements in mind include the planting of fruit trees and bushes in the dell, at Baildon, the name of which is thought to come from the Salt family's choice of the location for the growing of ferns.

The Partnership hopes to bring its ideas to a Neighbourhood Forum cycle in Baildon in the summer.
